The world we inhabited in 2019 seems like a totally different place from the one we inhabit now. The COVID-19 crisis and the mass protests for change in response to police killings have re-shaped our lives and shifted our perspectives on a wide range of things, including public safety, community health, work, and education. They have also opened up new opportunities for change and revealed new understandings of what it is possible to achieve.

Open Society Institute-Baltimore has seen and responded to many changes over the course of its 22-year history. The organization has always strived to be responsive to the people of Baltimore, to amplify the voices of marginalized communities, and to identify emerging opportunities to advance human rights and progressive change. In 2019, OSI saw some of the most significant changes in the organization’s history, which prepared us well to meet the challenges of 2020 — some of which we anticipated and some we most certainly did not.
In early 2019, in response to ongoing and emboldened threats to open society in the United States, including more overt bigotry in the public discourse and autocratic tendencies in the federal government, Open Society Foundations reorganized its US-based work as Open Society U.S., integrating and aligning the Baltimore office with offices in New York and in Washington D.C. By streamlining resources, increasing collaboration, and integrating our diverse perspectives, OS-US will be better situated to meet this challenging moment in US history.

As part of that reorganization, OSF made the decision to renew its investment in Baltimore, and in doing so, underscored the organization’s commitment to the intensive place-based philanthropy we do here, while also giving us greater financial security. As a result, OSI-Baltimore staff will not need to invest nearly as much time and resources to fundraising as we had in the past and can focus more on collaborative efforts with other funders as well as public, private, and grassroots partners.

In June, OSI experienced one of its most significant changes when founding director Diana Morris stepped down after more than 20 years at the helm. We are all so grateful that Deputy Director Tracy Brown was able to step in as interim director during this period and expertly lead the organization through these changes.

Since I joined the organization in January, 2020, I have been endlessly impressed with the thoughtfulness, insight, and passion that the organization’s staff brings to its work. Through these momentous changes, my colleagues’ commitment to dismantling racism, listening to community voices, and holding leaders accountable has never wavered.

As I write this, Baltimore and the rest of the country continue to grapple with a global pandemic and an ongoing fight for racial justice. I’m confident that my colleagues and I, working with our many local and national partners, will meet this moment and move towards a stronger, more just city and country.

In Solidarity,

OSI’s Diana Morris and Tara Huffman publish Baltimore Sun op-ed, “Baltimore must prioritize police reform”: “To improve public safety, the city must use the consent decree to rethink the role of police in Baltimore. This means taking specific steps to change the culture of the BPD to embrace oversight and accountability and shift to a guardian mentality that helps residents truly feel protected and valued as partners.”

Thanks to fierce opposition from the OSI-supported Coalition to Reform School Discipline, the Baltimore City School Board voted unanimously to oppose HB31, a bill that would have allowed school police to carry guns inside school buildings.

OSI releases Building on the Unger Experience: A cost-benefit analysis of releasing aging prisoners, which detailed OSI’s support for a group of almost 200 aging prisoners being released from the prison system and found that their release resulted in a projected savings of $185 million to Maryland taxpayers with no impact on public safety.

More than 700 people attend OSI’s Talking About Race event, a conversation between Steve Luxenberg, author of Separate: The Story of Plessy vs. Ferguson and America’s Journey from Slavery to Segregation, and Chief Judge Robert Bell, the first African-American chief judge of the Maryland Court of Appeals.

OSI hosts its second Talking About Race event of the year, a conversation between Dr. Beverly Tatum, author of Why Are All the Black Kids Sitting Together in the Cafeteria? And Other Conversations About Race, recently released in an expanded 20th Anniversary Edition, and Baltimore City Schools CEO Dr. Sonja Santelises.

OSI hosts Dr. João Goulão, the architect of Portugal’s groundbreaking national drug policies, for a meeting with local leaders, medical personnel, community advocates, and others at OSI-Baltimore’s offices to talk about decriminalization and prioritizing harm reduction and public health.

The Baltimore Sun reports that 2018 Baltimore City graduation rates rose in all demographics. Increasing graduation rates has been a major goal of OSI investments like the Re-Engagement Center and High Value High Schools, including Bard Early College High School.

Charm City, a documentary film co-produced by 2015 OSI Community Fellow Meryam Bouadjemi, featuring OSI Community Fellows Clayton Guyton (2000), founder of the Rose Street Community Center, and Alex Long (2017), who works at Safe Streets and founded the McElderry Youth Redemption Boxing Program, debuts on PBS.

A new Vera Institute of Justice report shows that Maryland incarceration rates had dropped to their lowest level since the mid-80s. The primary goal of OSI’s Criminal and Juvenile Justice Department has been to reduce incarceration rates by investing in efforts that led to the Justice Reinvestment Act and reforms of parole and sentencing guidelines.

OSI hosts a farewell celebration honoring Diana Morris (below, with OSI-Baltimore Advisory Board Member Joe Jones) and her 21 years of service to Open Society Foundations and to the city of Baltimore.

OSI and the Baltimore Museum of Art (BMA) co-present a new exhibit, Slavery, The Prison Industrial Complex: Photographs by Keith Calhoun and Chandra McCormick, which documents life in the Louisiana State Penitentiary at Angola. OSI staff worked with the BMA to provide materials for the exhibit that connect Calhoun and McCormick’s work with the injustices of mass incarceration nationally and in Maryland.

Baltimore City Police Commissioner Michael Harrison releases a new crime plan that integrates several initiatives supported by OSI, including the Law Enforcement Assisted Diversion (LEAD) program and community policing.

Mayor Jack Young commits to funding the Safe City Baltimore initiative, which OSI founded with the Mayor’s office in 2017 to provide legal support for local immigrants at risk of being deported.

OSI, the Baltimore City Health Department, OSI grantee Bmore Power, and other groups co-sponsor Naloxone trainings at several Baltimore City locations to mark Overdose Awareness Day.

OSI’s Scott Nolen publishes an op-ed in the Baltimore Sun, “The ‘seatbelt’ approach to the opioid crisis,” arguing that “denying harm reduction services to people who use drugs is no different than denying seatbelts to people who drive.”
New Baltimore City Health Commissioner Dr. Letitia Dzirasa joins OSI’s Leadership Council to discuss the Health Department’s ongoing strategic planning process, including its series of Community Conversations.

Baltimore State’s Attorney Marilyn Mosby and City Council President Brandon Scott join OSI grantees Baltimore Harm Reduction Coalition, BMORE Power, and Charm City Care Connection at a press conference to encourage city and state officials to pursue Overdose Prevention Sites (OPSs) in Baltimore City, a goal of OSI’s Addiction and Health Equity Program.

In 2019, the Addiction and Health Equity Program continued our work to leverage health care reforms to increase access to quality addiction treatment services. Our funding supported successful efforts to create the country’s first prescription drug affordability board, which will help address the unsustainable rising costs of medications in Maryland. OSI-Baltimore also supported efforts to address gaps in insurance coverage and insurance practices that negatively impact access to treatment. The goal of our efforts is to continue to both build on the expanded access to health insurance created by federal health care reform and to make sure that hard working families are not denied services by rising health care costs.

The Addiction and Health Equity Program maintained its partnerships with a number of harm reduction organizations in Baltimore and across the state and backed people directly impacted by substance use to advocate in their own voice. These funding streams supported peer recovery specialists and other individuals with lived experience with addiction or substance use so that they would be able to organize, access trainings and educational resources, and provide harm reduction-based street outreach to people using drugs in Baltimore City. The program also continued to support low-barrier access to treatment and other services by funding local drop-in centers and a mobile treatment van.
Lowering the Threshold to Treatment

With thousands of Marylanders dying each year from opiate-related overdoses, it is still far too difficult to access treatment and other resources to meet their needs. In 2019, the Addiction and Health Equity Program supported a number of initiatives to make it easier—also known as lowering the threshold—for people dealing with a substance use disorder to access community-based services.

Knowing what treatment programs and other resources exist in one’s community is critical to being able to access those resources. That’s why OSI-Baltimore worked with the Baltimore City Health Department to launch Charm Care, an online directory of resources for city residents, including treatment programs, housing, workforce development programs, food access, and educational support. Drug treatment providers use the system to share their capacity to accept new patients in real time, so residents can quickly and easily find a treatment program that meets their needs with immediate intake availability.

Drug use is still criminalized, so a disproportionate number of people incarcerated in the Baltimore City Jail have a substance use disorder. Studies have shown that newly released prisoners are 40 times more likely to experience an overdose than the general population, making the first days after release from jail a critical time to connect people with drug treatment and harm reduction services. That’s why we supported the Behavioral Health Leadership Institute’s Project Connections at Re-Entry (PCARE) van. It sits outside the Baltimore City jail to get people started on treatment as soon as they’re leaving jail. This low-threshold program accepts returning citizens regardless of whether they have insurance or even an ID, getting them immediately engaged in treatment and services so they can stay alive and receive needed supports as soon as they are released.

While increased access to drug treatment is still needed across the city, we also recognize that not everyone is ready to stop using today and harm reduction services can help to keep people healthier and safer while they are in active drug use. That’s why we supported Charm City Care Connection (CCCC), a drop-in center in East Baltimore, to open a harm reduction service program in 2019. In addition to CCCC’s health screenings and case management, the harm reduction service program offers overdose education and naloxone distribution, sterile syringe distribution and collection, regular drop-in hours, weekly community lunches, and other leisure activities. These resources build a supportive community that engages Baltimore residents who have typically been disconnected from treatment and other services in the city.

OSI commissioned these posters, illustrated by Alex Fine, to be displayed at City Hall, the Baltimore City Health Department, and other locations around the city on August 31st to mark international Overdose Awareness Day.
2019 was a year of planning and strategizing for the Criminal and Juvenile Justice Program. We continued the important work of policing reform, partnering with U.S.-based and international Open Society Foundation colleagues to convene law enforcement officers, advocates, and community leaders to share challenges and identify ways we can work together to transform policing culture, policies, and practices. These efforts included a convening in Nairobi, Kenya, which brought together stakeholders from five continents to talk about policing reform in a global context, exchange ideas and learnings, and set the stage for more coordinated efforts in 2020 and beyond.

The Criminal and Juvenile Justice Program worked to convene a wide range of grantees and community advocates such as Homeless Persons Representation Project, Power Inside, Disability Rights Maryland, SWOP Baltimore, Public Justice Center, and Baltimore Harm Reduction Coalition—to name just a few—to take on the ambitious project of decriminalizing race, poverty, gender, and disability in Maryland to reduce incarceration and police. The program also worked to increase the use of restorative justice practices—like those provided by OSI grantee Restorative Response Baltimore—as an alternative to the criminal justice system.
We also spent 2019 thoughtfully reframing and restructuring our work to increase investments in organizations led by people of color, such as Baltimore Ceasefire, Black Leaders Organizing for Change, and those most negatively impacted by current justice systems, such as Out for Justice and Life After Release.

2019: A Year of Restorative Justice

With support from OSI-Baltimore, grantees Out for Justice, Job Opportunities Task Force, Maryland Justice Project, and the ACLU of Maryland, helped win the restoration of voting rights for people with felony convictions immediately upon their release from prison. Previously people had to complete parole, probation, and pay any outstanding fines and restitution before they got their voting rights back. In another victory for the formerly incarcerated, in 2019, OSI grantees supported the Maryland Legislature in adopting a statewide “Ban the Box” policy for employment applications. That means that employers are prohibited from asking if applicants have a criminal record on hiring applications. Finally, OSI-Baltimore’s support of our grantees helped bring about a legislative mandate that the Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services conduct a gender-based study to determine how to better prepare and support women who are being released from prison after years of incarceration.

The Education and Youth Development Program seeks to ensure that all students are fully included in schooling and other opportunities that prepare them for success in adulthood.

An overwhelming majority of youth in Baltimore City Public Schools experience the effects of concentrated and, most often, generational poverty, coupled with limited exposure to opportunities. This experience is further compounded by discriminatory treatment in and out of school. Equitable education is the most accessible way to break out of the crippling cycle of poverty.

OSI-Baltimore believes that equitable education is best achieved by removing prohibitive barriers and inequitable practices that push children out of school and into the school to prison pipeline. The Education and Youth Development Program seeks to ensure that all student groups are fully included in schooling and other opportunities that prepare them for success in adulthood.

The Open Society Institute’s work to integrate restorative practices (RP) in Baltimore City Public Schools has taken off. The district has integrated this work into its Blueprint for Success, nearly 60 of the district’s 174 schools (over one third) have already begun implementation and all Baltimore City School Police have been trained in RP, contributing to a 79% drop in school-based arrests over a four year period.
Moreover, the advocacy for and implementation of RP in Baltimore City has catalyzed the state to recommend the use of restorative approaches in all school districts in Maryland. We are excited that this practice is gaining traction in Baltimore and in Maryland, but we realize that schools alone cannot change attitudes and behaviors regarding violence.

As part of OSI-Baltimore’s long-term vision to make Baltimore a restorative or healing city, the Open Society Institute has begun to move beyond schools and into communities.

Safe Streets Partnership

Baltimoreans were alarmed and concerned when in 2019, Baltimore’s gun violence culminated in 348 homicides, the deadliest year on record. Sadly, these numbers largely involved adolescent and young men. In response to this crisis, the Education and Youth Development Program sought to partner with Safe Streets Baltimore, an organization that has a long track record of reaching and de-escalating people who are contemplating violence. Safe Streets, like the organization it is modeled after—Chicago’s CeaseFire program—employs formerly incarcerated outreach professionals, called “violence interrupters,” to de-escalate and mediate disputes in the community that might otherwise result in serious violence. Safe Streets staff have already received a two-day training in RP in partnership with OSI, the Family League, and the Positive Schools Center and have indicated that this practice is highly compatible with their violence interruption practices.

Safe Streets staff work out of offices in violence-affected communities, which puts them in contact with a variety of challenges that people living in Baltimore experience, including toxic stress, mental and physical health challenges, unstable housing/homelessness, addiction concerns, criminal/juvenile justice issues, and basic documentation needs. So in addition to addressing violence, Safe Streets staff often find themselves handling numerous problems that fall outside of their scope of work and expertise. Because of its proven track record of significantly reducing homicides in the neighborhoods that they serve, in 2019, Safe Streets prepared to create several new offices in Baltimore. OSI plans to partner with Baltimore City and Safe Streets to provide these strategically located Safe Streets offices or “community hubs” with additional training and support in an attempt to extend the reach and capacity of Safe Streets interrupters.

Training

Funding in 2019 allowed all Safe Streets personnel to engage in group training in next-tier restorative practices, mindfulness, soft skills, gender awareness, and domestic partner violence. These trainings broadened the set of tools Safe Streets staff have at their disposal.
to prevent and disrupt violence in their respective communities.

Community Assistants

Funding will be earmarked to allow designated Safe Streets offices to provide stipends to community-based assistants who will support those offices by acting as: liaisons and organizers in the community, RP and mindfulness facilitators, neighborhood canvassers, and/or lay advocates. These Community Assistants will help support the functionality of the selected sites and invite greater participation in violence interruption from community residents.

Needs Assessment

A community services needs assessment, resource mapping, and community canvassing will also be conducted in selected/if not all of the neighborhoods being served by Safe Streets. This will ensure that interrupters are well positioned to make needed referrals for the myriad concerns that community members bring to their offices for resolution. Safe Streets staff are aware that these concerns denote important risk factors for violence, and that addressing these concerns not only reduces their impact on violence, but also builds needed trust between Safe Streets staff and community members.

OSI-Baltimore launched the Community Fellowships Program in 1998. There is now a corps of over 200 social justice innovators working throughout the city. The program’s “open valve” approach allows applicants to identify local problems deserving attention, regardless of whether they match OSI-Baltimore’s existing priorities, and to define the community they wish to target.

In a city struggling with the impact of past and present discriminatory policies and practices and chronic disinvestment, the Community Fellowships Program provides a channel for individuals to respond to the city’s many needs. For example, many communities have limited access to public services, appropriate street lighting, timely trash removal, and effective public transportation. They lack thriving schools, supermarkets, recreation and after-school programs, affordable childcare, and employment opportunities.

In 2019, the program had three goals: identify the entrepreneurial talent dedicated to revitalizing Baltimore’s communities; develop a strong Community Fellows Network by helping fellows to enhance the skills needed to be as effective in their work as possible; and integrate the Fellows’ community experience into priority Open Society fields. Fellows are included in cross-program collaboration activities involving OSI.
staff, experts, and practitioners working on informing and advancing changes in practice and policy work.

As part of goal two—developing a strong Fellows Network—the Fellows Advisory Board (FAB) worked with consultant Marianne Hughes and her team to assess the strength and impact of the Community Fellows Network. With FAB, which is made up of 11 Fellows from the program’s 22-year history, the Fellowships program produced network maps, published a white paper, held several network leadership sessions, and hosted two network summits. In addition, the program contributed to a 2019 article by Didi Goldenhar, “Weaving a Network for Baltimore: Five Lessons Learned with the OSI-Baltimore Community Fellows” (available at osibaltimore.org).

At its core, the Fellows’ work is power building. The effective way in which the work is undertaken contributes to culture and narrative change in Baltimore City. FAB members are committed to establishing strategies to strengthen the relationships within the Fellows Network and in building a more equitable Baltimore by leveraging the talent of network members to address a shared social justice issue.

From Weaving a Network for Baltimore: Five Lessons Learned with the OSI-Baltimore Community Fellows by Didi Goldenhar

1. To build collective power, invest in network training, structure, and strategy.
2. For network building, convening is the glue—especially in a city like Baltimore.
3. Networks need to see themselves and the bigger picture.
4. Engage the healthy tension in social justice networks—between relationships and taking action.
5. Go deep before broad. Right action emerges from trusting relationships.

The initiative is assisting job seekers with the social, emotional, and psychological pain associated with mid-career job loss through counseling, coaching, information/referral, networking and outreach.

Damien A. Haussling is developing the Baltimore Furniture Bank to connect low-income individuals and families to much needed gently used furniture and other household items by working with case managers, social workers, and similar professionals.

In partnership with the Baltimore Compost Collective, Marvin L. Hayes is growing the number of youth in the Brooklyn/Curtis Bay neighborhood trained in the science and art of community composting as a non-burn waste diversion strategy – “learn so we don’t have to burn.” The initiative will evolve to include other neighborhoods throughout the city.

Kanav Kathuria is establishing the Farm to Prison Project as a means to address the public health crisis regarding food conditions in prisons. The initiative seeks to improve all aspects of food served in correctional facilities and build alternatives to exploitive practices by food service companies.

Using the intergenerational mentoring near-to-peer model, Alphonso Mayo is establishing Mentoring Mentors as a vehicle to establish long-term mentoring relationships with African American youth ages 12-18. The initiative is helping youth with social and emo-
Through a series of educational workshops and parent engagement, Dinorah Olmos is establishing La Escuela, sus Hijos y Usted: Empowering Latino Parents to Support Student Success as an initiative designed to educate, empower, and inspire Spanish speaking Latino parents to effectively engage in the parent-school community.

Mariah S. Pratt Bonkowski is establishing PoP Pantries (micro pantries) to combat food instability and hygiene poverty by increasing access to emergency food and hygiene items for families in need.

Ana Rodney is establishing MOMCares as an initiative to provide prenatal and postpartum Doula services to low-income African American women navigating high-risk pregnancy or with a child involved in the Neonatal Intensive Care Unit (NICU).

To address the need of housing instability for Spanish speaking residents in the Brooklyn/Curtis Bay community, Kendra Summers is establishing Casa Amable (kind home) as an initiative to support emergency housing services, promote long-term stable housing, and help Latinx residents learn tenants’ rights through a housing-based ESOL curriculum.

Blueprint for Baltimore: 2020 and Beyond

In the fall of 2019, OSI launched the Blueprint for Baltimore project, an attempt to lift up the priorities of Baltimore’s marginalized communities and ensure that our city’s prospective leaders are held accountable to them. OSI partnered with five community-based organizations to conduct an on-the-ground survey, share the results widely, and hold a series of public forums where candidates in the 2020 elections would hear community concerns and explain how they would respond to them if elected.

The project evolved from the Solutions Summit in 2016, when OSI convened communities around Baltimore to talk about priorities in the areas of jobs, criminal justice, and behavioral health. That process culminated in a summit at the War Memorial Building, where more than 700 people voted on a final 16-point action plan that was presented to newly elected Mayor Catherine Pugh. Pugh accepted the plan and shared her own policy proposals in response. Several of the items in the action plan, like the creation of an online platform to identify drug treatment slots, became reality in the ensuing years.

Looking ahead to the 2020 elections, OSI and its community partners, Baltimore Votes, Black Girls Vote, CASA, the No Boundaries Coalition, and Organizing Black, wanted to take a more data-driven approach. Each of the community partners held survey-design workshops where Baltimore residents identified the most pressing areas they wanted the survey to address. The partners also recruited Data Fellows, who would conduct the survey with door-to-door canvassing and at community spaces and public events.

The result was the Blueprint for Baltimore Survey Report, which compiled the responses of more than 5,000 Baltimore residents from all 55 Community Statistical Areas (CSAs), including many that are rarely represented in significant numbers in traditional surveys. We were able to record these communities’ priorities because trusted community-based organizations conducted the survey and will take the lead on how the data, also available online at Baltimore Neighborhood Indicators Alliance’s Blueprint for Baltimore Data Portal, is used.

In February, 2020, OSI hosted a mayoral forum where moderators asked candidates how they would address community priorities identified in the Blueprint for Baltimore data. A similar forum was planned for City Council President candidates, but because of the COVID pandemic, moderators conducted remote interviews based on the Blueprint data. A third forum, co-sponsored by the Stoop Storytelling Series, also moved online.

In the months after the Blueprint data was made public, advocates have used it to push for policy changes aligned with community priorities. OSI will continue to work with community partners to identify ways the data can be leveraged to make government more accountable and we are already exploring more surveys to build on our work in 2019.
Talking About Race

For more than ten years, OSI has hosted important, often difficult conversations about race and society. In 2019, we hosted three events in the series:

February 13: Former Washington Post senior editor Steve Luxenberg, author of Separate: The Story of Plessy v. Ferguson, and America’s Journey from Slavery to Segregation, talked with Judge Robert Bell, chief judge of the Maryland Court of Appeals—the state’s highest court—from 1996 to 2013 (the first African-American to hold the position) about the current-day relevance of Plessy v. Ferguson through the eyes of the people caught up in the case.

March 25: Dr. Beverly Tatum, educator, administrator, and author of Why Are All the Black Kids Sitting Together in the Cafeteria? talked with Baltimore City Public Schools CEO Dr. Sonja Santelises about the continued relevance of this book 20 years after it was first published and the role race plays in schools today.

October 15: Poet, essayist and national spokesperson for the Campaign for Youth Justice Reginald Dwayne Betts talked about his latest poetry collection, Felon, with 2015 OSI-Baltimore Community Fellow Lady Brion.

Leadership Council

OSI’s Leadership Council is an eclectic and engaged group of people who share a commitment and a passion for Baltimore—and who actively want to be part of the solutions for its future. It was established to widen the network of people who know about the issues that OSI addresses and the work that we do, and who serve as ambassadors. The Council meets for quarterly sessions to learn more about OSI’s work. These were the topics and guests in 2019:

February 27: A conversation about LGBTQ inclusion in schools and beyond with Jabari Lyles, LGBTQ Liaison in the Mayor’s Office and Board Chair (and former executive director) of GLSEN Maryland, Mark Procopio, executive director of FreeState Justice, and Karen Webber, director of OSI’s Education and Youth Development program.

May 10: A conversation with Ganesha Martin, who had recently been appointed director of the Mayor’s Office of Criminal Justice, and Tara Huffman, director of OSI’s Criminal and Juvenile Justice Program.

September 18: A conversation with Baltimore City Health Commissioner Dr. Letitia Dzirasa, who had been appointed in February, and Scott Nolen, director of OSI’s Addiction and Health Equity Program.
December 10: Preview of the 2020 Legislative session with Delegate Brooke Lierman, Delegate Shelly Hettleman, Shamoyia Gardiner of Advocates for Children and Youth, and Scott Nolen, director of OSI’s Addiction and Health Equity Program.

Special Events

April 26: OSI, the Mayor’s Office of African-American Male Engagement, and the Reginald F. Lewis Museum hosted actor/producer Michael K. Williams, who memorably played Omar Little in “The Wire,” for a screening and discussion of “Raised in the System,” a documentary about the juvenile justice system that Williams produced and stars in. After the screening, Williams participated in a panel discussion that included Felicia Porter, Snoop from the “The Wire,” and Williams’ nephew, Dominic Dupont, both of whom appeared in the film, and OSI Criminal and Juvenile Justice Program Director Tara Huffman, Baltimore City State’s Attorney Marilyn Mosby, and others.

June 11: OSI celebrated and said farewell to founding Director Diana Morris and thanked her for 21 years of service to Open Society Foundations and the people of Baltimore. Among those offering tributes to Diana were Open Society Foundations President Emeritus Aryeh Neier, Former Vice President and Director Open Society Foundations U.S. Programs Gara LaMarche, Executive Director of Open Society-U.S. Tom Perriello, OSI-Baltimore Advisory Board Chair William C. Clarke, III, Advisory Board members Andre M. Davis, Joseph T. Jones, Jr. and Nupur Parekh Flynn, and OSI-Baltimore Deputy Director L. Tracy Brown.

OSI-Baltimore Advisory Board Member Nupur Parekh Flynn, Andre Davis, and Diana Morris
June through September: OSI co-sponsored a powerful exhibit at the Baltimore Museum of Art, "Slavery, The Prison Industrial Complex: Photographs by Keith Calhoun and Chandra McCormick," which documents life in the Louisiana State Penitentiary at Angola, known as "The Farm." On September 5, OSI and the BMA hosted a panel discussion on issues surrounding mass incarceration with prison rights advocate Norris Henderson, founder of Voice of the Experienced, and Baltimore native Monica Cooper of the Maryland Justice Project and the driving force behind Baltimore’s "Ban the Box" legislation. The event was moderated by Annie Anderson of the Eastern State Penitentiary Historic Site. Tara Huffman, director of OSI-Baltimore’s Criminal and Juvenile Justice Program gave opening remarks.

In 2019, Open Society-US invested $25 million in multiyear grants to build power among local organizations led by, and accountable to, people of color. Following are the grants from that investment that were made in Baltimore in 2019.
